Dear Ms Harman,

Equality and Human Rights Monitor 2023

I am writing to bring to your attention our landmark report into the state of equality and human rights in Britain in 2023, which we have published and sent to Parliament today (16 November 2023).

The Equality and Human Rights Monitor outlines extensive findings in relation to areas of progress, areas for improvement and areas that have stayed the same, in addition to wide-ranging recommendations to improve equality and human rights in Britain. The report is available in full on our website.

In this letter, I am bringing to your attention matters of particular interest to the Joint Committee on Human Rights.

Following on from our last 'Is Britain Fairer?' report in 2018, the Equality and Human Rights Monitor 2023 draws on the comprehensive data outlined in our Measurement Framework to assess progress on equality and human rights over the last five years across Britain.

Overall, we have found that there have been significant challenges to equality and human rights in this period, including:

- the profound impact of the COVID-19 pandemic
- the UK's departure from the European Union
- the period of high inflation as well as the economic impact of the war in Ukraine.

These events have exacerbated some persistent, long-term inequalities. For example, the data shows that whilst more young people have been reporting mental health conditions since 2010, the numbers rose further during the pandemic and remain high.

These events have also been a catalyst for new trends. For example, the increase in home working has benefitted parents, older and disabled people, and those with caring responsibilities.

I would particularly like to draw your attention to our findings on human rights in the UK where we have seen that:

- The earnings gap between disabled people and non-disabled people has increased.
- Women in Britain now have higher rates of poverty than men.
- Child poverty among children aged five and over has risen in the past decade in Britain. The number of children affected by the two-child limit on Universal Credit and Child Tax Credit is growing each year.
- A quarter of adults aged 65 and over in the UK do not have access to the internet in their home and 43% of them are defined as 'narrow' users of the internet and potentially at risk of digital exclusion.

- There is limited data on Gypsies, Roma and Travellers but what is available shows that they have the poorest educational and work outcomes and are among the most excluded.
- There has been significant emerging case law clarifying the scope of protections for beliefs and expression of beliefs, and the extent to which provision of services can and cannot be restricted on the basis of religion and belief.

Our report also sets out recommendations to address these findings, including:

- Government and local government, in collaboration with disabled people in line with Article 4(3) of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (UNCRPD), should take, and report on, action to narrow the earnings and employment gaps between disabled and non-disabled people.
- The UK government should review the Disability Confident scheme to ensure that it improves employment outcomes for disabled people.
- Central and local government should take, and report on, action to eliminate the gap in poverty rates between men and women in England, particularly for single parent families, in line with CEDAW recommendations to improve women's economic equality.
- Central and local government should take, and report on, action to reduce rates of child poverty.
- All government departments and public bodies with responsibility for providing public services should take action to ensure that the 20% of older people who still do not regularly access the internet are not disadvantaged in accessing services.

As you will be aware, public authorities are required under the Public Sector Equality Duty \(PSED\) to publish specific and measurable equality objectives. Our recommendations are designed to support the development of these objectives and help ensure that this legal obligation can be performed in a way that is strategic and focused on the most significant equality challenges identified by the data. Objectives must be revised and published at least every four years, but this can be more frequent.

We hope that our recommendations will help you to target action to where it is needed most to continue to build a fairer society.

We would be keen to discuss these findings and recommendations in more detail and would be delighted to offer you a meeting at your convenience.

Yours sincerely,

Baroness Kishwer Falkner
